

No photo is worth anything until it is shared. This is particularly true of wildlife and nature photography. The opportunity to experience nature “up close and personal” is far too limited for most people, so striving to share with others that which they would not normally encounter is the goal.

While nature photography can be limited by equipment and photographic technique, it is more often defined by opportunity. It matters not if you are a great photographer if you are never in the right places to point your camera at the eagle when he flies over.

This exhibit contains a collection of images captured over multiple years. Most have been shot here in Fulton County during paddling or hiking excursions, or even around the house. The few that are taken in other locations are pictures of cousins of “neighbors” who reside nearby.

I hope you enjoy the images and share the excitement I felt when in the fortunate circumstance to capture them.
